Overview

The Civil Justice Council (CJC) is an Advisory Public Body, established under the Civil Procedure Act 1997. The CJC is responsible for reviewing the operation of the civil justice system, highlighting problems, identifying opportunities and making recommendations for improvements in order to modernise the court system and improve access to justice.

The CJC by its very nature is not a delivery body. Its success comes in its ability to champion issues and its power to convene the right organisations and individuals to effect change.

The CJC strives to hold a full complement of members from a diverse range of backgrounds and industries who are able to support the Council to meet its core objectives. The Council is seeking to improve diversity amongst its membership in order that it is more representative of those engaging with the civil justice system and society as whole. It is hoped that greater diversity will bring new ways of thinking to Council and will enable it to more effectively fulfil its statutory remit as new and different viewpoints are represented. A recruitment campaign for five new members is underway and expected to conclude later this year.

The CJC's work programme necessarily reflects a combination of:

- being reactive to emerging themes and issues,
- responding to government consultations and stakeholder requests to examine particular areas of the civil justice system, and
- proactively using the insights derived from its membership and their wider networks to identify challenges and opportunities for improvements in the system.

The CJC has agreed a set of prioritisation criteria to assess its work, and potential work, and to promote consistency and ensure relevance.

For the Council to effectively fulfil its purpose it draws on the expertise and experience of members and a vast network of stakeholders and organisations, working collaboratively on research projects in the field of civil justice and hosting events to inform and connect the public, government, judiciary and professionals. The CJC is academically respected and it is important that the Council remain aware of academic developments in the area of civil justice.

The Council aims to capture the value of interacting strands of its own work and in relation to the wider sector to encourage collaboration, ensure work is not being duplicated and contribute to the bigger picture of the civil justice system.

The CJC will strive to monitor and measure impact, including to inform next steps.

Rationale

The time frame for this business plan from June to December 2021 was chosen to reflect the pace of the work by the Council under the chairmanship of Sir Geoffrey Vos, the Master of the Rolls (MR). It also necessarily reflects the wider circumstances and events under which the civil justice landscape operating noting that further change is likely in the short to medium term. The document may become iterative as work progresses.

In the current period, key features of the environment shaping the CJC's work include:

- Court reform, in particular the digitisation of the courts
- Collecting and using data to understand the effect of the civil justice system
- Access to justice concerns for those without means or legal capability
- Recovery from the Covid-19 pandemic
- (Alternative) dispute resolution
- Supporting the MR in delivering his vision for the future of Civil Justice.
